The value of making digital solutions to solve real world problems at scale is why Dave evolved from a career in energy management to a career in software development.

For over 10 years he's been working on ways to improve how people use energy. Initially on the shop floor, consulting with large industrial clients on how to best manage their sites and processes to have the least impact to the environment. An underlying interest in computers soon lead him to build a few programs to automate common calculations, and now he gets the chance to contribute to the cutting edge of digital energy services at Sero.

When he doesn't have his computer on, Dave spends a lot of time in his garden, growing vegetables and working on his bonsai collection. He also spends many weekends travelling around the South West coast and summer festivals with his partner Carolyn in their van.
